Not only are the forest reserves in general for use, but every individual resource is likewise to be used, under the single restriction that it shall be so used as to become permanent. Timber, water, grass, minerals, are all to be open to the conservative and continued use of the people. They must be used but the must not be destroyed. The extension of the present forest area, by restocking cut-over lands and by making plantations where there are no forests, is one of the chief duties of the present moment. This will be accomplished by the helping the States to formulate their own policies, by active co-operation in studying the local situation in each, and by recommending the best procedure under the conditions that are found to exist.
